"Thomas Pynchon's fantasies are, in many ways, a consummation of that kind of 'fantastic realism' found in Dickens, Dostoevsky and Kafka."

"One of the greatest and perhaps most optimistic horror stories of our time, Gravity's Rainbow, takes place on the border that separates time, diversity, and cause and effect from eternity, unity, and synchrony; it maintains an energetic suspension of interlocking elements, which are a Gestalt of the narrating persona as well as the simultaneous self of the mind of the text."

Typical Timese: "Thomas Pynchon dwells somewhere in an aloof privacy, in deep cover, making metaphysical devices in his basement, like a terrorist who has gone into the fireworks business."
- Nelson, William. "The Humor and Humanizing of Outrage." Thalia, 2, No. 1-2 (1979), 31-34.
Compares Pynchon and García Márquez; discusses Lot 49: Pynchon's comedy, "while often dark and lacking the festive quality of Fielding, is none the less a way of balancing our horror with a saving grace."

Discusses Lot 49 in terms of a convergence of C. P. Snow's two cultures, which appears to be the outcome of a regressive tendency.
- Poenicke, Klaus. "Jenseits von Puer und Senex: der Pikaro und die Figurenphänomenologie der Postmoderne." Amerikastudien, 24, No. 2 (1979), 221-45. (passim)

"Perhaps the Picaro, traditionally an 'un-balanced' figure, forever meandering between servile submission to senex pressures and fits of puer rebellion, adapts with particular ease to the dramatization of a more open, tolerant, process-oriented mode of experience."

Russell, Charles. "Individual Voice in the Collective Discourse: Literary Innovation in Post-modern American Fiction." Sub-Stance, 27 (1980), 29-39. (passim)

"Making ridiculous and grotesque the complex of . . . meaning systems that envelop us, Pynchon's metaphors proliferate freely to reveal both how meaning systems do interpenetrate and tend toward aggressive totalization, and yet how no system can bear too much input before it starts to fall apart under its own weight."
